

Responses on Coronavirus Outbreak in China

We have received many inquiries from our North American business partners regarding the coronavirus outbreak in China. We are very appreciative of the concern expressed by many of you for the health and well-being of our employees.

Dahua's headquarters in Hangzhou are well outside of Wuhan and the epicenter of the outbreak. Nonetheless, we have taken various precautions to prevent the spread of the illness amongst our employees. The manufacturing facilities, which have been closed for the Chinese New Year, are scheduled to resume production on February 10th. At this time, we do not anticipate that the coronavirus will cause any material disruption to our business or our ability to supply products to the North American marketplace.

In consideration of our business partners and customers, any U.S.-based Dahua employees who have returned from recent trips to China will be self-quarantined at least for 14 days before they will be permitted to return to our offices or interact face-to-face with our anyone in the field. In the meantime, our team remains approachable to support our customers via E-mails or phone calls.

The situation, of course, remains somewhat fluid, and we will provide prompt notification to our business partners should there be a change in circumstances that might reasonably be expected to affect our ability to continue business as usual.
